Moscow Explains Aims of "Peaceful Coexistence" Policy to Indian Communists

25X1

[The major aims of Khrushchev's policy of "peaceful co-existence" are to isolate the United States from the rest of the world and to gain time in which to build up the bloc's military and economic power.]

25X1

[Khrushchev's strategy is said to call for preserving the status quo for "seven years or so," after which the USSR and Communist China will be so strong that they will be able to prevent "imperialist" intervention in countries where revolutions are taking place. With this major shift in the international balance of power toward the Sino-Soviet bloc, recurrence of such situations as Taiwan and Korea will be avoided, the Indian Communists were advised.]

[Khrushchev has also presented these views to Chinese and other Communist leaders. This suggests that Moscow feels the need to provide a detailed interpretation of the coexistence policy to rank-and-file members of the international Communist movement.]

[Soviet leaders are said to feel that "official circles" in the United States are divided between those who favor coexistence with the USSR and those who favor a policy of maintaining tension. The major achievement of Khrushchev's visit to the United States, [ ] was his exploitation of this rift to gain more support among the "coexistence" group, which allegedly commands "greater" support with the American people.]

[Moscow reportedly assumes that nothing will come of Khrushchev's proposal for general and complete disarmament. While there may be]

25X1

[partial disarmament, the "imperialists" are fundamentally opposed to disarmament, in Moscow's view.]

[Khrushchev's peaceful coexistence strategy eventually is to lead to the "automatic" surrender of the US, after the rest of the world is Communist. In this connection, [redacted] a major Soviet objective is to convince the American people they would be losers in a nuclear war. They claimed that the Soviet sputniks and luniks have been successful to a great extent in demoralizing the American people.]

25X1

[redacted] the Chinese Communist threats to liberate Taiwan are designed to show that Peiping does not fear the US, but Peiping will not attack Taiwan in the foreseeable future and cannot do so without the USSR's consent.]

[redacted]

[redacted] Khrushchev at that time reportedly urged that Communist parties in India and other nonbloc countries should avoid uprisings and other "warlike situations," on the grounds that if war can be avoided for three or four years, the military strength of the bloc will surpass that of the capitalist powers, especially the United States.) Mao Tse-tung Reported Concerned Over Western Influence
In India

[redacted]
(Mao Tse-tung recently indicated his concern over the in-roads Western influence could make in Asia and particularly in India because of adverse reaction to Peiping's role in the Sino-Indian border dispute, [redacted] Stressing the "great importance" of Sino-Indian friendship, Mao implied [redacted] he puts a high value on improving relations with New Delhi as a useful hedge against "the growth of right reactionaries and military dictatorships.")

(In this context, Mao made a decided effort to play down the border issue, terming it a "minor matter which is going to be settled" and assuring the Indians that Peiping has no intention of committing "aggression" against India. The Chinese already may have taken their first steps toward meeting Nehru's stipulation that Chinese troops must withdraw from Lonju. Recent press reports, as yet unconfirmed, state the Chinese are withdrawing from the outpost they seized on 26 August.)

(While Mao is clearly seeking to improve relations with the Indian Government, he remains distrustful of Nehru's attitude toward China and the bloc. [redacted] reported they found both Chinese and Soviet leaders united in their suspicions of the Indian prime minister.) [redacted]

Political Maneuvering in Laos May Lead to Government Crisis

25X1

[Political maneuvering in Vientiane over how to postpone the national elections scheduled for December is producing friction which could lead to a government crisis. Premier Phoui's conservative Rally of the Lao People (RLP) favors a constitutional amendment extending the incumbent National Assembly's mandate.]

[The army-backed Committee for the Defense of National Interests (CDNI), which shares power with the RLP, is obstructing moves toward a constitutional amendment, however, and appears to favor permitting the assembly's mandate to expire on schedule in December, at which time the regent, Prince Savang, would set a new date for elections and appoint an interim government. The CDNI probably calculates that the regent, a strong CDNI supporter, would give it a greater share of cabinet portfolios, if not eliminate Phoui and the RLP altogether.]

[Phoui himself has voiced concern that the CDNI, with army backing, may be considering taking advantage of the present dilemma over the elections to deny the RLP its "rightful share" of authority until new elections are possible. The extraordinary powers granted the Phoui government by the present legislature expire in January, and Phoui hopes to have them renewed after the constitutional amendment. On his current trip to the US, Phoui was careful to include in his entourage Foreign Minister Kamphan Panya, a leading CDNI figure, and Secretary of State for National Defense Col. Phoumi, believed to be a strong advocate of thinly disguised army rule in Laos.]

African Nationalists Demonstrate in Kenya

[Tension continues high in Kenya, where police on 20 October broke up a demonstration by African nationalists for the release of convicted Mau Mau leader Jomo Kenyatta. Earlier, African leader Tom Mboya had been forced to sign bond to keep the peace for 90 days--a move designed to block the demonstration but one which had little effect.]

[A major source of friction between the government and African nationalists is the government's refusal to legalize Mboya's Kenya Independence Group, on the grounds that it does not meet the requirement that all parties be multiracial. A second major issue is the government's 13 October proposal that the rich White Highlands farm area be opened to all races. The proposal has been attacked by Mboya as well as by rightist settlers; Mboya apparently believes that the government had not gone far enough, and also may fear that the government intends economic concessions to be a substitute for political concessions to Africans.]

[The demonstration for Kenyatta appears to have been planned in the face of indications that it would lead to Mboya's physical arrest, and was probably directed less toward the release of Kenyatta than toward embarrassing the Kenya Government. Mboya's leadership of the Kenyatta demonstration may enhance his prestige among Africans prior to the constitutional conference scheduled for early 1960 and offset to some degree his involvement in the factionalism which has lately plagued the African members of the Legislative Council.]

III. THE WEST

Bolivian Minister of Government Threatens to Try a Coup

Minister of Government Guevara Arce--who is aligned with the moderate faction in Bolivia's government party, the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement (MNR)--threatens to try to take over the government if Congress should adjourn without resolving a struggle between President Siles and the country's acting vice president, who is also president of the Senate and a Siles opponent. Guevara's objective is to protect the position of the moderate faction within the MNR and to prevent left-wing domination of the MNR's approaching convention. Since the MNR polled 80 percent of the vote in 1956 and 1958, the candidates nominated by the convention for the presidential and congressional elections to be held in mid-1960 are virtually assured of victory. Guevara has presidential ambitions.

Guevara would be helped in a coup by 800 armed miners now in La Paz and possibly by the police. Leftist miners and possibly other armed militia loyal to leftist labor leader Juan Lechin would oppose Guevara. The Bolivian Army would tend to side with the moderate faction, while the widely feared rural militia would probably favor the left wing. A coup attempt by either the moderate or the leftist faction of the MNR would result in an intense struggle for power and possibly in civil strife. [REDACTED]
